

Banks should not be exempt from the Wisconsin No-call list. There are plenty of other ways a bank can get my attention and market their product without invading my personal time or phone line with unsolicited calls. If I was interested in receiving sales pitches I would not have registered with the Wisconsin Do-Not-Call list. The only people who can benefit from making banks exempt is the banks themselves because they will prey on those who just can't resist; those without willpower; those who just can't say no - those who tried to say no by registering with the Do-not-call list but were over-ridden by corporation-friendly government. If a bank can't sell its product via television, newspapers, radio ads, mail, and marketing to current customers, then maybe their product isn't worth selling. A company should not need to invade thousands of individual's personal time just to make a shot-in-the-dark sale to the sucker who just can't say no. Wisconsin residents have spoken - WE DO NOT WANT UNSOLICITED SALES CALLS!
